senātor, ōris, m. [see R. SEN-; L. § 206]. I. In Rome, a senator, member of the Senate (originally one hundred citizens, selected from the noblemen by Romulus for wisdom and experience to advise him. When the Sabines united with Rome, a hundred of their nobles were added; and the number was successively increased by Sulla to four hundred, and by Julius Caesar to nine hundred, but Augustus reduced it to six hundred. The later additions were made largely from the Knights. The senators were appointed originally by the kings; during the early republican period by the consuls or dictators; but later, the censors revised the roll every five years, striking out names of bad repute. Only men of wealth were eligible, as no salary was paid. The senator wore a tunic with a broad purple band, and black leathern shoes with a 'luna' of silver or ivory; see clavus, II. B.; luna, II.
